Ethical Dilemma:

You are a high school teacher. You have a senior who is from a single-parent family. The student must work to be able to attend college next year. However, the job is interfering with the student's performance and several assignments have not been turned in. You have determined that a "D" is all the student can make when a counselor informs you that the student needs a "C" to qualify for an academic scholarship. What are the issues here? What do you do?

There are 2 main problems that may be deduced from the above situation.

1. Would giving the pupil a 'C' although a 'D' is all he deserves truly going to help him in the long run? What I mean by using that is, the requirements most tutorial scholarships have are of retaining a certain grade point traditional (GPA). It can be without difficulty argued that the job is hindering his potential at performing in class on the moment and that with a scholarship, he may don't need to ought to work in college and actually perform well. But with out a robust, right foundation in high tuition now, the scholar may be difficult pressed to preserve up in university.

2. Assuming that the student is given a full educational scholarship, it is difficult to foretell the trouble the pupil may have at dwelling. He may still be required to work to support his single guardian in paying for the bills. In this kind of scenario his grades would still be affected and in all probability his scholarship being revoked.

More than a few pupils have varying phases of academic potential. Therefore not figuring out the tutorial advantage of that senior and without difficulty upgrading his grade so he qualifies for a scholarship is more detrimental then just right, in my opinion. The excessive tuition trainer in her position would be in a greater position to judge stated ability and in doing so, if she will justify that he can real perform academically then upgrading the grade could be justifiable.
